Webinar Description

Subpoenas are legally enforceable evidence-gathering tools. They are routinely used in all kinds of proceedings (civil, criminal, arbitration, regulatory). Even if you are not involved in a dispute, you can be subpoenaed by a party to the dispute and required to provide relevant information. The subpoena may require you to testify under oath, or to disclose documents (including electronically stored information), or to permit the inspection of premises. If you fail to respond, you could put yourself or your company at risk of contempt of court, with ensuing monetary sanctions and potential jail time. If you fail to respond properly, you or your company could disclose more than you legally have to.
